Theoretical rationale for focus on form

- To acquire the ability to use new linguistic forms communicatively, learners need the opportunity to engage in meaning-focused language use.
- However, such opportunity will only guarantee full acquisition of the new linguistic forms if learners also have the opportunity to attend to form while engaged in meaning-focused language use.
- Given that learners have a limited capacity to process the second language (L2) and have difficulty in simultaneously attending to meaning and form they will prioritize meaning over form when performing a communicative activity (VanPatten 1990).
- For this reason, it is necessary to find ways of drawing learners' attention to form during a communicative activity. As Doughty (2001) notes, the factor that distinguishes focus-on-form from other pedagogical approaches is the requirement that focus-on-form involves learners briefly and perhaps simultaneously attending to form, meaning and use during one cognitive event (p. 211).
